

Conservation continued from page 1

People have always collected for different, and very often, for personal reasons:

- ❖ Lifestyle – you saw it in a magazine and want it in your home
- ❖ Nostalgia – Grandma, Mom or You (as a kid) had one like it and want it again
- ❖ Investment – quality antiques historically retain, or appreciate, in value

Tough economic times—when Headlines and our bank accounts tell us to conserve resources—is exactly the time to collect antiques and fine old book. These are investments as well as consumer goods and enhance our lifestyles and preserve our memories of the past.

Sows' Ear Antiques has, over the past five years, consistently found quality items, often with an interesting provenance, that we offer at low country prices. Lately, we've helped our customers by stocking up on small furniture items that are easy to transport in smaller vehicles. Washstands, chests and tables, and that perfect "orphan chair," are usually available and will fit into tight transport spaces. Chests and trunks are very popular and serve double duty as coffee tables and hidden storage.

We also have several light-catching art glass pieces from the 1930-1960's on hand that will elegantly accent any décor. When such pieces are not signed, they can be relatively inexpensive and still retain value.

For example, hand blown, cased glass, Amberina, and mold produced depression era vases, pitchers, bowls, are in stock and waiting for a new home on your shelves and tables.

When surrounded by messages encouraging conservation, heed the cry! Buy an antique!
